

PREPARED FOR

Ara Skin Clinic

The conversation ended the moment it needed something in writing.

He asked for treatment details, was offered a call, said he was at work. The thread stops there.

OBSERVED – WHATSAPP EXCHANGE, TUE 11 AUGUST

4:33 PM “could you provide me with more info on acne/scars treatment please”
PATIENT

4:35 PM “Can we call you sir”
CLINIC

4:36 PM “busy with work, could you drop the info here” · “so that i could have a PATIENT look”

NO FURTHER REPLY. THREE DAYS ON, THE THREAD STILL ENDS HERE.

Real messages to the clinic's own number, inside working hours.

Nobody decided to drop this one — the reply came in two minutes when there was a call to offer. Attention isn't what's missing; a second route is. And a patient who goes quiet doesn't look like a loss from inside the clinic. He looks like someone who changed his mind.

WHY THIS MATTERS

Asking for details in writing is usually a buying signal — it's what someone does when they mean to compare and decide later. If the only way forward is a call, those patients don't argue. They stop replying.

CONFIRMED FROM OUTSIDE

- ✓ 4.8★ across 294 Google reviews, and every negative one has a personal reply — four out of four, none templated.
- ✓ Practo carries two patient stories against 294 on Google. These enquiries arrive on the clinic's own reputation, not a paid listing.

CAN'T CONFIRM WITHOUT YOUR DATA

- Whether someone called the number anyway. Nothing came back on WhatsApp either way.
- Whether treatment details exist in sendable form at all — a range, a leaflet, anything readable in their own time.

WHAT WE'D CHECK FIRST, IF WE HAD ACCESS

- ➔ How many enquiries in the last month asked for something in writing, and what happened to each.
- ➔ Whether the answer to “send it here” could be one saved message — treatments, what each involves, the range — so declining a call stops ending the conversation.

What we're not saying: this isn't a case against calling patients — a call is usually the better conversation. Nor was a message missed: it was read and answered in two minutes. It's about what exists for the person who says no.

This isn't unique to Ara. The real question isn't whether one person went quiet — it's how many who asked for something in writing are still waiting.

You can check this without us: open that number and count the threads where the last message is a patient's, not yours. If it's worth doing properly, we'd map thirty days of enquiries at no cost to the clinic.
