

PREPARED FOR

Dermatonik Aesthetic Clinic

“Please let us know your concern.” He did — and nobody followed it up.

Three days, four messages out of the clinic, and not one question back into it.

OBSERVED — ONE ENQUIRY, 10–11 AUGUST

WHAT THE CLINIC SENT

MON 4:34 PM

An automatic welcome asking for the patient’s concern.

MON 4:37 PM

Before-and-after photographs of real acne results.

MON 4:39 PM

Clinic photographs and a link to the Google listing.

TUE 4:34 PM

“Starting 5500/-”, plus a note to come in for consultation.

WHAT THE CLINIC ASKED

Nothing.

Not what kind of acne, how long he’d had it, what he’d already tried, or when he could come in.

He answered the welcome message with one word — acne. Nothing since — three days.

Everything that left the clinic was fast and generous. Nothing came back the other way — so from the inside, someone ready to start a course next week and someone browsing on their lunch break look identical, and get an identical reply.

WHY THIS MATTERS

Sending is the easy half. Clinics ask a couple of questions before quoting so that somebody knows which enquiries are worth a phone call. Without them, the person who was nearly ready gets no more attention than the person who was never coming.

CONFIRMED FROM OUTSIDE

- ✓ Four Meta ads live, and Google creatives running near-continuously for close to a year — still active the day before this enquiry.
- ✓ 4.8★ across 304 Google reviews. The clinic is well regarded by the people who do come in.

CAN'T CONFIRM WITHOUT YOUR DATA

- Whether the answers people give to that welcome message are written down anywhere, or read and moved past.
- Whether someone calling the clinic gets asked more than someone messaging it.

WHAT WE'D CHECK FIRST, IF WE HAD ACCESS

- The last month of enquiries — how many were asked a single question beyond the automatic welcome.
- Whether two or three questions could sit behind that welcome message, so the answers arrive with the enquiry rather than after the photographs have already gone.

What we’re not saying: this isn’t about anyone being slow — three minutes to a real answer is quicker than most manage. And the photographs are good; sending them is the right instinct. It’s about the return leg, which at the moment doesn’t exist.

The photographs, the price, the links — all of it went to someone the clinic had asked nothing about. The number worth knowing is how many others got the same.

You can find it without us: scroll back a month and count the enquiries where the clinic’s last message was an answer rather than a question. If it’s worth going through properly, we’d map thirty days at no cost to the clinic.
