Ministry of Skin

Ahead of most clinics on the promise. Behind on what it captures.

We tested Ministry of Skin's after-hours WhatsApp last week. What we found says less about whether one callback happened, and more about what that window is set up to do at all.

OBSERVED — WHATSAPP AFTER-HOURS REPLY

AFTER HOURS The clinic's WhatsApp replied immediately: "we've received your AUTOMATED, INSTANTLY message and one of our team members will get back to you during working hours."

NO CALLBACK BY THE NEXT WORKING-HOURS CHECK
WORKING HOURS The callback the message promised didn't come.
PROMISED CALLBACK

This was a real message sent to the clinic's own WhatsApp number — not a guess.

A single test can't tell us whether every after-hours promise gets kept. What it does tell us: even when it is, the message never asked who they are, what they want, or when they need it — so whoever calls back starts from zero either way.

WHY THIS MATTERS

Ministry of Skin runs 44 active Google ads across both branches — the highest ad spend of any clinic we've reviewed — pointed at cheek fillers, lasers, hair, and advanced treatments that vary widely in price and urgency. The after-hours WhatsApp message is a genuinely good instinct: most clinics don't even promise a callback. But right now the promise is the entire message — it doesn't ask what treatment, which branch, or how soon. So by the time a rep is back at a desk on a working day, all they have is a phone number and a promise to keep, not the context to open the call already knowing what that person needs.

CONFIRMED FROM OUTSIDE

- ✓ Ministry of Skin runs 44 active Google ads across both branches — the highest ad spend of any clinic in this review — promoting cheek fillers, skin treatments, hair treatments, laser procedures, and advanced aesthetics.
- ✓ The after-hours WhatsApp message automatically promises a personal callback during working hours — a genuine step ahead of most clinics, which have no after-hours reply at all.
- ✓ Reviews repeatedly mention appointment waiting time and scheduling coordination, alongside strong praise for the doctors and technology.

CAN'T CONFIRM WITHOUT YOUR DATA

- Whether the promised callback goes out consistently, or only sometimes.
- Whether whoever calls back already knows what treatment or branch the enquiry was about, or opens the conversation cold.

WHAT WE'D CHECK FIRST, IF WE HAD ACCESS

- How many after-hours enquiries land across both branches in a typical week, and how many actually get the promised callback.
- Whether adding two or three questions to that same after-hours message — treatment, branch, timeline — would let whoever calls back open already knowing what the person needs.

What we're not saying: the after-hours automation isn't a bad idea — promising a callback at all puts Ministry of Skin ahead of most clinics we've looked at. This isn't about the team not caring either. This is only about whether that window is being used to do anything besides make a promise.

This isn't unique to Ministry of Skin — most clinics that build an after-hours reply stop at the promise, because the promise itself already feels like progress. The real question isn't whether the callback goes out; it's how much a rep already knows about someone by the time they do call — and whether that's the difference between opening a conversation and starting one from scratch.

A full audit — mapping exactly what that after-hours window could capture before the callback ever happens — takes about 30 minutes, at no cost to the clinic.
