

PREPARED FOR

VIDA Skin & Hair Transplant Clinic

The question was what it costs. The answer was where it starts.

A request for a pricing brochure, and the single line that came back in its place.

OBSERVED – THE PRICING REQUEST, TUE 11 AUGUST

The day before, this number answered in two minutes: “This is Indira from Vida skin and hair transplant clinic. What treatment you are looking for skin sir?”

ASKED FOR

“could you send over a pricing/quote brochure or details for the treatments”

CAME BACK

“It start from 3500 to 6500”

No brochure. Neither number attached to a treatment. Nothing since – three days.

Between 3,500 and 6,500 isn’t a price, it’s a starting point. A patient can’t compare it, plan around it, or say yes to it. And when they go quiet rather than ask again, nothing about it looks like a failed answer.

WHY THIS MATTERS

Someone who asks for a brochure has decided to take this seriously — they want something to sit with, and usually to show someone else. If what arrives can’t do either, the enquiry doesn’t end in a no. It stops.

CONFIRMED FROM OUTSIDE

- ✓ Twelve Google ad creatives running, the most recent live on 7 August, plus a Practo Prime listing with 302 patient stories. Two paid channels, both pointed here.
- ✓ No Meta ads — the spend sits on search and the aggregator, where people go when they are already looking to buy.

CAN'T CONFIRM WITHOUT YOUR DATA

- Whether a pricing brochure exists at all, or whether the range is what everyone gets.
- Which treatment the 3,500 refers to and which the 6,500 — acne clean-up and MNRF were both named earlier, neither attached to a figure.

WHAT WE'D CHECK FIRST, IF WE HAD ACCESS

- The last month of enquiries that reached a price — how many asked again, how many stopped there.
- Whether one saved document — treatments, what each involves, what each costs — could go out the moment someone asks.

What we're not saying: this isn’t about response times — Indira answered in two minutes and used the patient’s name, which most clinics never manage. Nor about the prices being wrong; we have no idea what they should be. It’s what a patient can do with the answer.

Somewhere on that number is a list of people who were told where the price starts and never came back to ask where it ends. That list is the one worth counting.

You can do it without us: scroll back a month and count the enquiries that stopped one message after a price. If it’s worth doing properly, we’d map thirty days at no cost to the clinic.
