What We're Seeing Across the City's Aesthetic Clinics

The pattern first. What's actually true of your clinic specifically is what we're there to find out.

01 · WHERE THIS COMES FROM

Not a guess: a few months of actually looking

Over the last few months we've researched well over a hundred skin, hair and aesthetic clinics across Bangalore: reviews, ad activity, how each one is actually set up to receive a patient. A dozen-plus we tested ourselves: messaged on WhatsApp as a patient would, then read what came back. In the last two weeks we've sat down directly with a handful of founders, including our conversation with you.

The same five things show up almost everywhere, regardless of how good the clinic otherwise is. Worth naming plainly: right now, we can only tell you what's common. Not what's true of your clinic specifically.

02 · THE PATTERN

Five things, in clinic after clinic

01 Real money going into getting the phone to ring

Almost every clinic we've checked is spending on Google or Meta right now, not once, continuously. For most of them, getting someone to enquire isn't the hard part any more. It's paid for.

02 Answered by a person, not a system

WhatsApp is where patients actually ask, and in every one of the dozen-plus clinics we've messaged ourselves, a person typed the reply, not a bot. That's not a criticism; it's the default here. It just means the quality of the first reply depends entirely on who's holding the phone that minute.

03 Nothing runs itself after hours, or on a busy one

Where automation exists at all, it usually stops at a greeting. It says hello; it doesn't ask what someone needs, and it can't book them in. The moment nobody's free to type, the enquiry simply waits. For however long that takes.

04 It lives in memory, not in a system

Who got a reply, who got followed up with, who was quoted and never came back: clinic after clinic, that lives in one person's head, or a personal notebook, not anywhere shared. Nothing wrong with the person. There's just no record for anyone else, including the owner, to check against.

05 Front-desk time goes to repeating itself, not to the room

The same person typing "hi, what treatment are you looking for" to the fortieth enquiry this week isn't fully present for whoever's sitting in the chair in front of them. That trade happens quietly, all day, in almost every clinic we've looked at.

03 • WHAT THIS ACTUALLY COSTS

None of it shows up anywhere

None of the five things on the last page show up in a monthly report. Nobody has a number for how many enquiries got a real answer versus a template one, or how many quotes went cold waiting on a follow-up that assumed someone else was handling it. That's not because it isn't happening. It's because there's currently no way to see it happen.

A gap that's invisible by nature doesn't get fixed by someone trying harder. It gets fixed by something that's watching all the time. Right now, almost nowhere is.

04 • WHAT WE BUILD

The part after the ad, before the front desk

What we build sits exactly there: between an enquiry landing and a person picking it up. It answers immediately, in the clinic's own voice, asks the two or three things that actually matter, and books straight into the diary. The moment a real person replies, it stops talking. It never talks over your team. Everything it captures lands in one place, so nothing depends on memory.

05 • BACK TO YOUR CLINIC

This is the pattern. The next step is checking it against you

From what we've seen of your clinic specifically and from our conversation so far, some of the five things on the earlier page will probably sound familiar. Some may not apply to you at all. We'd rather find out which is which in your clinic than guess at it from outside.

One thing worth saying plainly

This document is the pattern, not a diagnosis of your clinic. We haven't earned the right to tell you what's true of your clinic specifically from outside it. That's what our next conversation is for: sitting with how enquiries actually move through your clinic, in the room, before either of us says anything about what to do next.
